

Yes, in Python, you can pass a function into another function as a parameter and then call that function with specific parameters inside the receiving function. This is possible because functions in Python are considered "first-class objects" and can be treated like any other variable.

This technique is often used to create flexible and reusable code, allowing the outer function to perform a general task while using the passed-in function to handle a specific part of the logic.